SOME ENERGY TIPS...

Insulate your home to adequate standards. It is the most important single step toward saving energy in the home. Before building a new home, check with your utility company for insulation standards which it may require as a prerequisite for service connections.

Add insulation to your existing home where possible. Your home should have a minimum R-30 insulation in the ceiling or attic. For advice on insulating your home, see an insulation contractor.

Choose window sizes and types that will not only save you energy but give optimum light and view. Larger glass areas increase heat loss and gain. Try to hold glass area to 15 percent or less of the square feet of floor space.

Select low emissive or insulated glass for windows throughout your home. It keeps heat inside during winter and outside in the summer.

Install wood- or metal-frame storm windows to provide a second thickness of glass and a layer of still air that retards heat transmission.
